Why create a lifelong singer?

For children, the benefits of singing are no secret. Chorus America's 2009 Chorus Impact Study found that young choral singers see greater academic success and more advanced social skills than those who don't. Several other studies show kids who read music tend to score higher on math tests and have a greater understanding of arithmetic.

The study found that children who sing in choruses get significantly better grades than their classmates who were never in a choir. Parents of choristers reported that participating in a chorus contributed to other qualities that help their children learn and develop—such as good memory, good practice and homework habits, and high levels of creativity.
